Analysis of Asian/Pacific-Islander (API) Students (2006 – 2011)

CRC Research Office
January 2012
Although the number of Hawaiian and Samoan students are relatively small, their average course success rates are lower compared to other groups.
Although the number of Hawaiian and Samoan students are relatively small, their precipitous drop in average course success rates for the 2010-11 year deserves note.
In general, students who were 25 or older had higher average course success rates compared to younger students.
Analysis of Asian/Pacific Islander Students vs. CRC (2009 – 2011)

In general, females had higher average course success rates compared to males.
Hawaiian and Samoans have the lowest average course success rates for Basic Skills, College-level and Transfer-level courses.
Hawaiian and Samoan students who are full-time have higher average course success rates than their part-time cohorts.
Hawaiian students who are “first-generation” have significantly lower Average course success rates compared to the rest of the Asian/Pacific-Islander students.
Analysis of Asian/Pacific Islander Students vs. CRC (2009 – 2011)

It is interesting to note that Samoan students who are First-time freshmen have significantly higher average course success rates compared to the other Asian/Pacific Islander ethnic groups.
Samoan students have the lowest average course success rates regardless of enrollment in day or evening classes.
In general, Asian/Pacific Islander students where English is not their primary language had higher course success rates compared to English-native language students.
In general, Asian/Pacific Islander students had lower course success rates in Internet-based instruction compared to other modes.